1	Apple's motion for a sur-reply should be denied as improper, but, in any event, it bolsten
2	AliveCor's motion for an adverse inference.
3	As to the propriety of the motion, Apple provides no legitimate basis for its requeste
4	sur-reply. In its opposition to AliveCor's adverse inference motion, Apple attempted to defend against
5	its spoliation by arguing, inter alia, that it searched 240,000 of Mr. Cha's "custodial files." Dkt. 158-
6	at 2, 3, 7, 12-13, 15. Apple notably did not substantiate what exactly was in those files. Id. AliveCo
7	replied to that argument, which is proper and provides no basis for a sur-reply. Applied Material.
8	Inc. v. Demaray LLC, 2020 WL 8515132, at *1 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 16, 2020). Even if AliveCor ha

And, it was fully able to provide this type of information in the original briefing, but did not Even if the Court accepts the sur-reply and Apple's unsupported say-so about the contents of the files it searched, they only bolster the points in AliveCor's motion.  First*, although Apple vaguely contends that "emails" were within the files searched*  , see Dkt. 153-3, at 21:21-23:6; Dkt. 161-1, at 12:2-4,  This sur-reply is apparently Apple's view of its last best shot, and it still does not address the core spoliation issue.

1 Apple's blanket citation to the supposed "240,000 custodial files." See Dkt. 161-1, at 5-6. 2 Third, Apple does not identify the time frames for the materials it searched. Much of the anticompetitive activity about which AliveCor complains occurred from 2016-2019. Apple's failure 3 4 to mention the time frames of the Cha materials it searched (even though that is just a subset of his 5 time at the company) is telling, especially when its productions for other custodians show that the 6 server side emails—i.e., the type of emails Apple spoliated for Mr. Cha—extend back for years. 7 Fourth, adding up the numbers Apple cites, that is just over 125,000 files. As AliveCor noted in its reply, Apple clearly tried to inflate the amount of Cha files it searched to imply lack of prejudice, 8 9 and this proves the point. Nearly half of the "240,000" documents are ones that Apple itself does not deem worth noting for the court, once again showing that Apple's use of statistics here is to mislead. 10 11 Moreover, almost half of the files Apple highlights were Messages (i.e., communications sent through 12 Apple's iMessage service). Mr. Cha testified 13 Dkt. 153-3 at 22:18-23:1. 14 15 16 In the end, it remains undisputed that: Apple deleted Mr. Cha's work emails; Mr. Cha 17 admitted and Apple produced just 45 Cha documents in comparison to thousands of documents each from its other custodians. The requested 18 19 sur-reply is improper, but, even if it were not, it supports—not undercuts—AliveCor's motion. 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28
